MEDICAL LIBRARIANSHIP

A HANDBOOK OF MEDICAL LIBRARY PRACTICE recently compiled by a committee of the Medical Library Association sets a high standard of attainment for medical librarians. The extent of the knowledge they should possess is great and the perfection of the service they are called upon to render is exacting. For example, in the chapter on Reference Work, Mrs. Eileen R. Cunningham states that, "No matter how fine a collection of medical works may be, unless the librarian and other members of the staff are competent to aid their clientele in the use of these works, the facilities are wasted." In the chapter on Cataloguing, Miss L. Marguerite Prime draws attention to the fact that it is the responsibility of the medical librarian to produce on request specific information upon any and all subjects falling within these boundaries; namely, physics, chemistry, and botany, and in recent years with sociology, industry, and aviation, with public health and every phase of the nation's welfare. This personal aid to those who come to the library is specially emphasized throughout the book.

Since most medical libraries are connected with schools and institutions of learning, they are integral parts of educational programs and consequently, their function is largely concerned with aiding students and those in the immediate vicinity, who are engaged in research. As the collections grow and the students move away to give place to others, the clientele tends to become dispersed and the responsibility of serving these at a distance becomes greater. This is recognized by Mrs. Cunningham in the further statement that, "The scope of this service is not limited to the library walls but extends far beyond them through interlibrary loans."

Although interlibrary loans go a long way toward extending the limits of service which can be rendered by libraries, microfilm copying, introduced some years ago, accomplishes this purpose far more conveniently, efficiently, and economically. This application of microfilms falls short of being fully realized by those who have contributed to the Handbook since the only mention of them is in connection with their care as acquisitions to the library. They have thus come to be regarded more as a means of acquiring material not otherwise obtainable than as a method of rendering the collections available to those who cannot come to the library or prefer to consult the source literature in the quiet of their own surroundings.

Perhaps it is the problem of the care of microfilms as acquisitions to libraries that has prejudiced librarians against their practical use in extending library service to persons at a distance. One of the advantages of this use which should appeal strongly to librarians is that the books themselves do not leave the library and all the inconveniences and annoyances incident to this are avoided. The operation of the limited-scale microfilm copying that would be necessary in most libraries, requires but a very small amount of equipment and no qualifications other than those possessed by the average library employee. The operations involved in making microfilms are not much more numerous than those required to serve readers who come to the library, and they can usually be performed at times not devoted to satisfying the immediate needs of readers.

The cost of microfilm copying in a library is very closely proportionate to that resulting from an increase in circulation due to any other cause. Since libraries are organized for use and it is circulation statistics which are the criteria of achievement, librarians should have little difficulty in obtaining, or hesitancy in allocating, the funds necessary for an increase in the circulation of their collections arising from the use of microfilms.

Finally, it may be mentioned that since the system of inter-library loans has been developed on the basis of mutual aid, microfilm copying should likewise be regarded as a reciprocal service among libraries. Even the smaller ones often possess material needed by the clients of the larger libraries and they should be equipped to do their part in rendering more widespread service through microfilm copying.
